

Burgas, on the other hand, is a major city on Bulgaria's Black Sea coast, with a population of about 200,000. It spans an area of 253 square kilometers, making it one of the larger cities in the country. Burgas has a long history, with evidence of settlements dating back to antiquity, but it flourished particularly in the 19th and 20th centuries as a key port and economic hub. The city's GDP per capita is higher, around €15,000, driven by its thriving tourism, port activities, and industrial sectors. Both cities offer a blend of historical significance and modern development, contributing uniquely to Bulgaria's cultural and economic landscape.
